TORONTO, ON – April 22, 2022 – Kendra Fisher, a resident of Etobicoke, ON, is running for the second year in a row. Last year, she dedicated her run to her late son, River, who she lost in 2018. Her hope – that by running and raising funds, she could help prevent other families from going through the tragic loss she experienced.

“I’m somebody who has always believed in showing up for others; because we can’t expect others to show up for the people we love if we aren’t willing to do the same for them. Tragically, my family knows what it is to need the resources we are blessed to have access to at children’s hospitals, in this country. The Million Reasons Run gives me the chance to show up for the people who have carried us through some of the hardest days in my life.”

Kendra’s lacing up this year once again in honour of her son, Bodhi, who was recently diagnosed with Type 1 diabetes. Last year, Kendra ran 125 KMs and raised over $3,600. This year she hopes to run 150 KMs and raise $5,000 for child health research.

In 2021, the inaugural Million Reasons Run was launched as a national running challenge held throughout May. Funds raised through the event will support the 13 children’s hospital foundations across Canada, benefiting life-saving pediatric research. Last year, nearly 8,000 runners across Canada crushed 300,745 KMs and raised over $2.2 million.

This year, The Million Reasons Run is back and the reasons to motivate our runners are endless, with the most important reason being the health of every kid in Canada. Every day across Canada, over 5,000 kids require care from a children’s hospital, and 250 kids need surgery. Donations received help uncover new cures and less invasive treatments through ground-breaking research and clinical trials.
